

The "Manchester Guardian," itself a lively centenarian, is glad to congratulate a brother who came on the scene so soon after itself. A newspaper which has survived the last century of history must have its roots in sterling qualities. One may heartily rejoice that such qualities have given the "Stockport Advertiser" permanence and success, because those newspapers also are national which have the flavour of the place and the people from whom they spring, and for that reason it is much to be desired that they should flourish and multiply.—MR. C. P. SCOTT, Editor and Proprietor of the "Manchester Guardian." to the Editor of the "Stockport Advertiser."
